Passage 1PRESERVING FOOD

As food is essential to the survival of human beings, ways were found to preserve food. The basic idea behind food preservation is either to slow down the activity of disease-causing bacteria or to kill the bacteria altogether. All food contains bacteria but food that is sterile contains no bacteria. Milk for example contains bacteria and within hours, milk can go sour if left out in room temperature. P1

Canning is one way to store food for long periods of time. In the canning process, the food is boiled in the can and bacteria are killed or new bacteria prevented from forming. Now, the food in the can is completely sterile and will not go bad. Once the can is opened, bacteria enter and start attacking the food. The opened can now has to be refrigerated to slow down the activity of the bacteria. Cans, may not necessarily be made of metal alone. Any sealable container can be used for canning and this includes glass jars, foil and even plastic boxes. P2

One disadvantages of canning is that the act of boiling food in the can generally changes its taste as well as its nutritional content. That is why sometimes refrigeration is preferred. Many types of food are also dehydrated to preserve them. These include powdered milk, dried fruit and vegetables, powdered soups, pasta and instant noodles. Most bacteria die or become completely inactive when dried. Therefore, dried food stored in air-tight containers can last for quite a long time. Drying sometimes completely alters the taste of the food but in many cases, a completely new food is created. P3

Salting is another preservation technique and is often applied to meat and fish. The salt draws out the moisture and creates an environment that is unsuitable for bacteria. If salting takes place in cold weather, salted meat can keep for many years. Pickling is also widely used to preserve meat, fruit and vegetables. The preservative qualities of salt combined with the preservative qualities of acetic acid or vinegar inhibits the growth of bacteria. Pickled mangoes are first soaked in brine for several days then dried and finally bottled in jars of vinegar. P4

Passage 2

She was a beautiful young flower and always so happy. Yes, she was happy until that evil day when she saw and loved the painter of her portrait. P1

They were married. But sadly, he already had a wife: his work. His painting was more important to him than anything in the world. Now she loves all things but one: her husband's work. His painting was her only enemy; and she began to hate the paintings that kept her husband away from her. And so it was a terrible thing when he told her that he wanted to paint his young wife's portrait. P2

For weeks, she sat in the tall, dark room while he worked. He was a silent man, always working, always lost in his wild, secret dreams. She sat still always smiling, never moving while he painted her hour after hour, day after day. He did not see that she was growing weaker every day. He never noticed that she was not healthy anymore and not happy anymore. The change was happening in front of his eyes but he did not see it. P3

But she went on smiling. She never stopped smiling because she saw that her husband, who was now very famous, enjoyed his work so much. He worked day and night, painting the portrait of the woman he loved. And as he painted, the woman who loved his, grew slowly weaker and sadder. P4

Several people saw the half-finished picture. They told the painter how wonderful it was, speaking softly as he worked. They said the portrait showed how much he loved his beautiful wife. Silently she sat in front of her husband and his visitors, hearing and seeing nothing now. P5

The work was coming near an end. He did not welcome visitors in the room anymore. A terrible fire was burning inside him now. He was wild, almost mad with his work. His eyes almost never left his painting now, even to look at his wife's face. Her face was as white as snow. The painter did not see that the colors he was painting were no longer there in her real face. P6

Many more weeks passed until one day, in the middle of the winter, he finished the portrait. He touched the last paint onto her lips, he put the last thin line of color on an eye then he stood back and looked at the finished work. P7

As he looked, he began to shake. All color left his face. With his eyes on the portrait, he cried out to the world, 'This woman is not made of paint! She is alive!' Then he turned suddenly to look at the woman he loved so much. - She was dead. P8
